This invention relates to a process for preparing methyl parahydroxybenzoate which is useful as a raw material for photo-sensitive materials such as heat-sensitive recording materials, photographic materials, lithographic printing materials and electrophotographic materials. Methyl parahydroxybenzoate which is produced by oxidation of p-hydroxybenzoic acid is known to be a phenol which is used as a raw material for synthetic resins, medicines, etc. Therefore, it is considered to be useful as a material for cosmetics, plastic products, etc. Methyl parahydroxybenzoate has been produced conventionally by oxidation of p-hydroxybenzoic acid with ozone or hydrogen peroxide. However, in these conventional processes, the use of ozone is undesirable because of problems such as production of toxic substances as by-products and damage to the environment. Further, in the process involving use of hydrogen peroxide, since the reaction is accompanied by explosive decomposition, a disadvantage is involved in the production efficiency and the control of this process is difficult. On the other hand, the present inventors previously found that methyl parahydroxybenzoate can be produced by oxidizing p-hydroxybenzoic acid with ceric ammonium nitrate in the presence of a specific accelerator and a stoichiometric ratio of the elements (Japanese Patent Application Kokai No. 60-30037). However, it is difficult to produce methyl parahydroxybenzoate in a large amount in such a reaction. Further, since the reaction is accompanied by explosive decomposition, the reduction of the reaction speed is a problem to be solved.
