This allows meatpackers to slaughter pigs that have been treated with a federal enzyme that breaks down the painful rigors of living in the factory farm. The USDA has approved the use of chymopapain as a way to “prevent lameness in pigs,” which could prove to be a life saver for an animal that lives 95 percent of its life in an enclosure, and is terrorized by cloven hooves. But the agency opted against certifying the use of the chymopapain as an effective treatment for hoof-related lameness because the enzyme can also be used for human consumption, thus opening up the possibility of legal and illegal sourcing of the chymopapain, which in the case of both USDA- and non-USDA-certified pigs, will almost certainly be an imported product from China. The USDA’s decision, which took place on April 8, “does not prevent the company from obtaining a USDA stamp for its pork or meat products in any case,” an agency spokesperson told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. The source of the chymopapain, which is produced by papain, came from China’s Anhui province, which has been a leader in the enzymatic harvest of papaya fruit for consumption in other countries. China, according to the USDA, is “the world’s largest producer and exporter of chymopapain.” In 2010, according to the USDA, the country made $165 million of the $451 million in annual worldwide production of the enzyme. China’s National Pork Group, which is involved in the production of pigs for human consumption, and responsible for promoting the chymopapain’s use for domestic pigs, has claimed that “[t]he US decision to approve for importation and marketing pork with chym

Domestic radio frequency (RF) telephony services (e.g., wireless) may experience a static or moving data packet loss depending on the particular path (e.g., access path) that is used to communicate the data packet from the source to the destination. While the data packets may be de-jumbled after arrival, such as through adaptive de-jumbling algorithms, the de-jumbled data packets may be severely deformed. Communications networks typically design de-jumbling operations based on worst-case, or expected, conditions. For example, in existing cellular networks, de-jumbling of RF signals is performed at a base station with full power and with the best operating conditions, usually using complex, computation-intensive algorithms. However, under such design criteria, the communications networks often fail to efficiently utilize the available resources and, as a result, experience a substantial degradation of service or may even fail to provide effective service. Accordingly, enhanced de-jumbling of RF signals in communications networks is desired.
