Pathologic study and morphologic analysis were similar in CTS and those cases interpreted as demyelinating polyneuropathies. In fact, 10 patients had morphologic evidence of regeneration activity in the biopsies, even when nerve conduction tests were suggestive of demyelinating polyneuropathies. A statistical analysis showed that nerve conduction abnormalities were not statistically correlated with morphologic findings. The morphologic study showed a significant correlation of the morphologic data with the age of the patients. Morphologic changes were not statistically correlated with the age of the patients. Morphologic analysis did not allow us to discriminate between CTS and those cases interpreted as demyelinating polyneuropathies. The nerve biopsy was useful in defining the type of the neuropathy. In our cases, the median nerve was mainly involved and the most frequent finding in all cases was the presence of fibrosis in the distribution of the nerve.
