Oh, I loved all the pictures of the veil plates (like the top of the old penny candy machine in which you insert the dime, the top one rotates, and you can see when it hits the bottom that is when you get your candy). Liana, Thanks for sharing your pics. They are really interesting. You can see that these plates are not true "vellicles" - they have a rough surface like marble. That must be a fascinating process. Sorry, it took me a while to get back at you on this. I have been enjoying very much the other postings. Cheers, Psychedelics

EU member states must take care not to impose additional hurdles on the NHS when it comes to patients seeking treatment in other member states. The comments were made by the European Parliament's drug agency, which published research earlier this week showing that a majority of the citizens of the 28 member states believe cross-border healthcare is not available in their own country. "We've seen that citizens still see the services provided by the NHS in another EU country as their healthcare system, even if they are not automatically able to access it," Jacqueline Cabannes, rapporteur for the study, said. "This would amount to a violation of the fundamental right to healthcare, which is a key principle of the EU Treaty." The fact that so few EU citizens feel comfortable with cross-border care is not a new phenomenon. This is, in part, because of the fragmented nature of the healthcare systems that cross many of the 27 member states. A system of healthcare provision that is administered by a number of different providers, supported by a number of different funding sources and handled by a number of different rules is difficult for individuals to navigate. There is no single system that can be identified as "the NHS" and the public view it as one coherent healthcare system. But if people don't know that their country has an NHS that is available to them, this will make people even less likely to use it when they need to. Even if there is an NHS, they may not realise that is the healthcare system available in their country. In the four countries that operate purely private systems for healthcare - the UK, France,
