More specifically, the present disclosure relates to compositions, kits, and methods for delivering growth factors to the surfaces of graft cells. Transplantation of cells and tissue remains a primary method for restoring function of defective organs and structures, such as heart tissue, following trauma or disease. The most common type of allogenic transplantation is that between genetically different species. For example, this type of transplantation can involve the transplantation of skin, heart tissue, pancreatic islets, and the like. For these and other transplants, immunosuppressive treatment is typically employed. The term immunosuppressive, as used herein, refers to the activity of pharmacological substances that block the immune response of the host to the implanted graft, thereby prolonging the survival of the graft. An important aspect of treating a transplant, or other implantable medical device, following implantation is to minimize the rejection of the implant by the
