(required).Various educational institutions have been established in recent years that are dedicated to the training of prospective business executives. Generally, these institutions provide the executive with both classroom instruction and a mentoring relationship between the executive and a senior executive from an established business. The training programs of these institutions involve the use of a modeling technique wherein the executive is given a simulated business environment. This simulated environment allows the executive to observe the operation of a real business in the context of a real environment and at the same time to practice skills he or she may learn in the classroom. The accuracy of the learning process of the executive in the simulation environment is often affected by the manner in which the environment is structured. One previously known structure for an environment simulating a business utilizes 6d1f23a050
