I'm doing a project in PHP and I've just encountered the decorator pattern. The class is quite simple, it is a decorator and it's takes in two parameters, and returns a new function by taking two parameters. That new function is now the new paramter of the decorated function. The decorator pattern is quite nice, as it allows me to add some functionality to my functions without having to create a new class or instance. However I encountered a problem that is not immediately obvious when using the decorator pattern. Here's the code: class BasicSetDecorator extends SetDecorator { public function __construct($function, $newName) { $this->function = $function; $this->name = $newName; } public function &__call($value, $key) { $return = call_user_func($this->function, $value, $key); return $return; } } I won't bother writing the classes SetDecorator and BasicSetDecorator. My problem is that the decorator pattern requires that the decorated class can be used like $obj->
