One of the other issues that we wanted to fix with AI was the composition of the enemy groups. It seemed to be a pretty random assortment of enemies in Shadowrun Returns; we wanted to go back to a more scripted approach that creates neat combinations. The first step was to develop a set of metrics for determining how well the enemy groups are performing. Each group was assigned a priority based on their chance to survive and complete the mission. This information could then be used to plan out a suitable strategy. In Shadowrun Returns, the main priority was survival. This meant that for most of the encounters, players would be forced to fight with a bare minimum of actions to survive. This made for some very difficult fights. We wanted to change that. In Shadowrun Dragonfall, the primary concern for all of our encounters is to complete the mission. This means that we want to push players into situations that make it very difficult for them to complete their mission, but do so in a way that rewards that effort with rewards. We also want to make sure that the skill calls are intuitive and required skills are clear. Since we want to reward players for doing difficult tasks, we also want to ensure that there are many ways to complete those tasks. To complete the mission, each group is given a certain number of actions. The actions that each group has are generated from the designer's preconditions and gives each group very different tactics. In Shadowrun Returns, the system was all about how many and how few actions players had to work with. This meant that if you timed your tactical maneuvers right, you could make some groups pretty tough to beat.

With Shadowrun Dragonfall, we are focused on making sure each encounter is a test of skill and tactics. When the players are presented with the situation, we want to force them to do different things. We want to make sure that when we push players to extreme conditions, it presents them with a situation where they are forced to make tough decisions. This is where the Hand of the Prophet comes in. The Hand of the Prophet helps us to plan out the encounters on the fly, and allow designers to add complex actions to the agents. So that brings us to the second big topic we need to address; the Anniversary campaign. While we always planned to release an Anniversary in the year after we shipped Dead Mans Switch, it turns out that we can now really justify an anniversary event that also ties into Berlin. To make this happen, we have hired our friend Marcelo Calvao, an incredibly talented writer, to come in and take charge of the story for the second chapter. Marcelo has been commissioned to help create a companion campaign that will focus on the city of Berlin itself. Players will be able to choose to travel through the classic, non-urban streets of DC, or through the glitz and glamor of New York, following the story of two families who are part of the shadowrunning community. Yet even as you build your team and find the right equipment, you will notice that something is awry - the visions of the future keep showing up in the strangest places; something is rotten in the city and its up to you to find out what is going on... and if you have to shoot your way to the truth. 5ec8ef588b
